4 Discussion and Conclusions

The research proved that using ERP significantly benefits the business effects responsible for overall condition of the entire organisation (including general improvement of financial results, profitability, revenues, adaptability etc.). This result correlates with numerous literature statements (Li et al. 2008; Cebeci 2009; Aloini et al. 2012). However, there was no significant relationship between ERP implementation and more specific effects—mainly efficiency and management effects. In the literature, attention is often directed to these kinds of benefits resulting from the use of ERP (Kale 2001; Hitt et al. 2002; McAfee 2002; Stratman and Roth 2002; Al-Mashari et al. 2003; Hendricks et al. 2007). On the other hand, the coexistence of ERP and other methods allowed better effects to be achieved—not only business effects, but also efficiency, management and environmental ones.
