Conclusion

This study investigated patients’ rights in Iran. According to the results of this study, it appears that since the passage of the Patients’ Rights Charter in Iran in 2002, there has not been any obvious official activity to improve patient awareness. Many studies have shown that written information, as part of regular educational programmes, is strengthened when combined with verbal information. Educational leaflets, booklets and posters about patients’ rights should be placed on public bulletin boards in all hospitals and health centres, so that they are visible to patients. Performing future questionnaire studies, combined with observation, will help us to understand and elucidate patients’ rights.

The results of this study suggest that health-care professionals can provide care based on patients’ rights, and that health-care professionals’ knowledge of patients’ rights needs to be evaluated and, if required, educational programmes should be prepared. Professional organisations and the Ministry of Health need to be more sensitive to the issue of patients’ rights.
