We aim to theorize gender, race, and class as mutually constitutive processes that do not place gender or race as addenda to class. Similar to Desbiens, Mountz, and Walton-Roberts’s (2004) introduction to the special issue of the journal Political Geography on feminist contributions to the subfield, these papers have been written in dialogue with many people who have also contributed to our intellectual and political development. These papers were edited and discussed collectively, a process that enriched the experience of writing and thinking through ideas by way of collaborative praxis. We thank the scholars that have come before us and hope that our research contributes to the literatures that have, in turn, inspired us.
